To summarize the evidence on the long-term benefits and risks of current heart failure therapies and provide an update on evidence-based approaches to the treatment of heart failure. Articles were identified through a computerized search of PubMed (January 2006-February 2012) using the following keywords: heart failure, heart failure guidelines, heart failure therapies, angiotensin converting enzyme inhibitors, angiotensin receptor blockers, beta-blockers, diuretics, cardiomyopathy, cardiac resynchronization therapy, left ventricular assist device, sacubitril, ivabradine, serelaxin, nesiritide, and placebo. Search results were limited to English-language, peer-reviewed articles. Although clinical data are often limited by sample size and duration of follow-up, recent advances suggest that selected heart failure treatments show promise. In the treatment of systolic heart failure, neurohormonal blockade with angiotensin converting enzyme inhibitors or angiotensin receptor blockers in addition to standard of care may reduce heart failure-related hospitalizations and death. Careful consideration of potential benefits and risks is necessary in choosing which heart failure treatment is most appropriate in individual patients. In patients with left ventricular systolic dysfunction and New York Heart Association class II-IV heart failure, treatment with beta-blockers, an angiotensin converting enzyme inhibitor, or an angiotensin receptor blocker is recommended to limit hospitalization. To improve survival in patients with systolic heart failure and ischemic and nonischemic cardiomyopathy, efforts to improve left ventricular function through cardiac resynchronization therapy and ventricular assist device implantation are warranted. Current heart failure therapies appear to be beneficial for select patients with heart failure. Further studies that will provide additional evidence on optimal therapy, new treatments and best practices for heart failure are needed.Osinek, who has served time in prison for a previous drug-related conviction, is a suspect in the murder of a Michigan woman whose body was found in the trunk of her car in October 2004.
