Erythrocyte membrane cholesterol levels in rat and human malaria. The levels of the erythrocyte membrane cholesterol in rat and human malaria were found to be significantly higher (p less than 0.01) than those of controls. A significant direct correlation (r = 0.566) was obtained between cholesterol and packed cell volume (PCV) in humans with malaria. The cholesterol/phospholipid ratio was increased significantly (p less than 0.01) in malaria. The activities of erythrocyte membranous enzymes (e.g. adenosine triphosphatase, glucose-6-phosphatase, nucleoside diphosphatase) were significantly (p less than 0.01) increased in malaria and correlated significantly with cholesterol/phospholipid ratio. The membrane microviscosity of RBCs as expressed by the erythrocyte aggregation index was significantly lower (p less than 0.01) in malaria. The data suggest that the increased cholesterol level in malaria may be the primary factor responsible for functional changes in the erythrocytes of the infected persons. The new approach described at the conference ensured that editors would "neither be blinded nor be a paid subject matter expert when performing peer reviews." To do otherwise, they claimed, would "impact the peer review process and risk the publication of flawed and mis-reported research." Possible effects In an interview with Scientific American, the editor-in-chief of the Journal of the American Medical Association, Dr. James H. Stone, was reported to have cautioned that implementing the new policy could lead to a "catastrophic devaluation" of the peer-review process. Stone's comments followed a meeting of the editors of the JAMA where the new policy was also discussed. In a survey of 1,000 faculty editors of medical and basic science research journals, the percentage of research submissions whose peer review process was influenced by the editors' funding was
